INTEGRATIVE MEDICINE FAQ

How does the Foundation define integrative medicine?
We see integrative medicine as an integrative and holistic approach to wellness. It is a partnership of traditional medicine and practices with complementary therapies.

How do I know if my program fits within the Foundation’s parameters for integrative medicine projects?
The Foundation considers IM projects that:
• Have "buy-in" from the medical leadership of institutions receiving grants
• Restrict grants to evidence-based research
• Have the ability to generate sufficient patients to complete trials in a timely manner
• Are doing research capable of generating broad public interest and, by extension, attract the participation of other private donors and the National Institute of Health (NIH)

When can I submit my integrative medicine project?
Integrative medicine proposals are accepted by invitation only. If you believe your project matches the above listed criteria, you may call the Foundation.
